Not long ago, a friend asked me if I intend to send my youngest son, my third, to kindergarten in time or if I would be opting to hold it. The question didn't surprise me. "Redshirting" or delay in the entrance of kindergarten for a year, it is not unusual where I live, and my daughter would be making the cut in our district for a few days. This was her the youngest in her series, something she came to see could be a positive thing academically. But the moment of my friend's investigation threw me a little: my daughter was only 2 and a half years old. Certainly this should have bought us some time to decide if it will be ready for almost 5 for kindergarten. Still, you can't blame the parents of children on the younger side for the note for worrying early and often, especially when we need to suffer with commercial anxiety inducers for websites and other products sold to prepare our children for kindergarten, which sounds More and more like a intimidating and relentless place, rather than the warm welcome to the education that used to be. Here are a few things I learned by interviewing mothers who have already made the decision when to start their child in kindergarten: according to Superpages, an online source of local information from all over the country, a total of 32 states in The United States require a child to be 5 years or before September 1 in the year when starting kindergarten, with 11 states having a cut date between September 1 and October 15. There are also 7 states that offer local schools the option Set your own dates required for when children should start school. You can start by finding the rules of your state here, but it is still worth a connection to the school district office, because these rules can change. You can also iaV iaV .sadatsivertne seEAm sad siap sod mu ed osac o iof omoc .alocse ad roterid olep sadidecnoc res medop siaicepse seþAŠAecxe es Be so happy with your decision, any way you incline, when your child enters the oldest year? I admit, I did not love the thought of my daughter being a young, say, fifth series with red boys that are a year (and some) older u sending my baby from 17 years to college. on the other hand, there could have been some disadvantages to hold it: after talking to some teen parents, I was not crazy to think about having a driver's license at the beginning of the first year of high school, a potential distraction during a crucial academic year for college. some parents interviewed agreed with the evaluations of their teachers that another year of preschool would help, whether in the development of fine motor skills u confidence u maturity. others felt that these were not necessarily good enough to postpone the kindergarten and were happy to trust their own instincts that their children were ready enough. State regulations aside, the mere age of your child does not need to be the only qualifier to start the kindergarten u wait another year. "What you will need to evaluate is a little deeper and harder to determine," explains the dra. elizabeth mathis, licensed clinical psychologist and certified school psychologist. "You want to honestly think about your son's socio-emotional growth," she says. "The expectation is that when a child is ready to start the kindergarten, he should be able to express his feelings in words rather than shout, grab, cry u if to throw on the ground." Here are some questions that mathis recommends answer honestly to help you start making your decision on when to start kindergarten: does he get along with other classmates? (for example, is he able to start a conversation? he is able to keepshort conversation?) Can he be stopped for a few minutes? Can he ask for help? can he write his name? Does he know the alphabet? he can recognize .sairogetac sairjÁv me etnemraluger es- odnacifissalc .edadilaug ed aloce ed oEÁŠAatuper amu uohnag etnemadipar ,7002 me sanepa adadnuf me adadnuf iof ³Ás
